My Prompt

Imagine you're a professional stand-up comedian preparing a tight 5-minute set for a live audience in a comedy club. The set should be packed with observational humor, clever wordplay, and relatable moments. Your comedic persona is a mix of witty, self-deprecating, and slightly sarcastic but always charming. Focus on everyday topics like technology, relationships, food habits, growing up, or cultural quirks. Write it in a natural, conversational tone with clear setups and punchlines. Structure it with a strong opening, engaging middle bits, and a callback or killer closer. Make it original, funny, and infused with your unique personality—something that would make a live audience laugh out loud.

Response

Absolutely! Here's a tight 5-minute stand-up comedy set, tailored with wit, self-deprecation, sarcasm, and a charming vibe. It's observational, relatable, and flows naturally:

[Lights up. Smiling confidently.]

Hey everyone! Great to be here tonight—because it was either this or arguing with my Wi-Fi router again. Spoiler alert: the router wins. Every time. Nothing like yelling “WHY ARE YOU BLINKING BLUE?!” at a small plastic box to really remind you how unqualified you are to be an adult.

I miss being a kid. Remember when our biggest problem was whether to trade our Pokémon cards or our dignity? Now it's like, “You're behind on your taxes and vitamin D.” What kind of RPG is this?

[Beat]

So I'm single, obviously. Not by choice—more like a joint decision between me and... everyone I've ever met.

Dating apps are wild, though. It's like ordering disappointment with extra cheese. You swipe right, they ghost you; you swipe left, now they're your coworker. Great—now I have to make eye contact with a missed opportunity every Monday at the coffee machine.

[Looks out at the audience.]

And dating in 2025? It's like playing Minesweeper. Except instead of mines, it's red flags... and mommy issues. You're like, "Oh wow, he loves cats and hiking!"—click—boom, "He believes the Earth is emotionally flat."

[Pause for laughter.]

I tried therapy. I told my therapist, "I think I'm the problem." She said, "Let's explore that." I was like, "Explore?! Ma'am, I live there. I built condos in my self-esteem issues. There's a Starbucks and a 24/7 doubt shop."

[Smile, lean in slightly.]

Technology doesn't help. Everything's a 'smart' device now. Smart fridge, smart speaker, smart watch. I'm surrounded by intelligence... and yet somehow I still locked myself out of my apartment because my smart lock updated while I was outside. I'm not smart enough to live here!

And don't even get me started on food delivery. I paid ₹400 for a dosa last week. ₹400! It came in artisanal packaging, with a side of shame. And now they have this thing called "contactless delivery." Which just means: we already left and good luck finding your food.

[Beat. Sip invisible drink.]

But you know what's changed the most? Our attention spans. I can't watch anything longer than a reel now. I was watching a movie and halfway through I was like, "Can we skip to the part where they break up, find themselves, and get back together over a Coldplay montage?"

Also, every YouTube ad is like: "Do you have 3 minutes to change your life?" No. I need 3 minutes to lie face down and avoid existence.

[Build to final section.]

And growing up brown? You grow up with one dream: impressing your parents. Indian parents don't say "I love you." They say, "So, what are you doing with your life?"

I told my dad I wanted to be a comedian. He said, "Very good. But what's your real fallback plan? Engineer? Doctor? Disappointment?"

I said, "Dad, it's going well! People are laughing!"
He said, "So am I. At you."

[Closer – Callback]

And I get it. Life is tough. But at least we have each other—and smart fridges that know when we're sad and order ice cream behind our backs.

So yeah, maybe I'm single, broke, slightly traumatized and allergic to commitment... but my Wi-Fi just started working again. So I think things are really looking up.

Thank you, you've been amazing! Just like my smart toaster—it also only works when no one's watching!

[Exit with a wink.]
